QUIRKY HABITS THAT SHOW YOU'RE SMARTER THAN EVERYONE (CONTINUED)

You Criticize Yourself

We tend to think that intelligent people are confident – why wouldn't they be, when they're so smart? In a landmark 1999 study from Cornell University, scientists found that incompetent people couldn't recognize their incompetence, which led to inflated self-assessments..."For poor performers to recognize their ineptitude would require them to possess the very expertise they lack," study author David Dunning, PhD, recently wrote in the "Pacific Standard."The study also found that highly competent people tended to underestimate their abilities. Smarties can recognize when they don't know something – in fact they know just how much more knowledge is out there. Instead of being overconfident, they tend to be self-critical.

You Daydream

Although scientists have previously thought mind-wandering negatively affected the brain's performance, new research suggests that may not be the case. A study from the University of California found that when given a demanding task, participants who took a break for undemanding tasks fared better at the original assignment. The researchers theorize that giving the brain an "incubation period," by allowing it to wander during a mindless task, boosts problem-solving and creativity.

You Talk to Yourself

You may think that mumbling to yourself makes you seem crazy, but in reality, it might be a sign of higher thinking, memory and perception skills. In a study from the University of Wisconsin and the University of Pennsylvania, researchers asked participants to remember and find objects. They were better able to recall the list of items to look for if they had said the names of the objects out loud. "Language is not just a system of communication, but I'm arguing that it can augment perception, augment thinking," study author Gary Lupyan, PhD, told "Live Science."...
