This is Probably the Least You'll Weigh All Year. Sorry.

Congratulations! According to a recent research team, led by Cornell University professor, Brian Wansink, if you are like the Americans in the study, your weight has reached an annual low over the past two or three weeks. But don't get too excited—you'll most likely get fatter soon.

Later this month, the numbers on your scale will begin a long climb past Thanksgiving and Christmas, peaking around New Year's Day.

What's worse, those extra holiday pounds tend to stick around for quite some time.

"Anything that happens in these next 8 weeks, on average, takes about five months to come off," said Prof.

Wansink. This doesn't just happen in America, the study included adults from Germany and Japan too. Different patterns were found in each country, but all three had one thing in common: Waistlines tended to grow in the 10 or so days leading up to the holidays.

"Whether it be office parties, receptions, your friends' parties, or the Annual Thanksgiving Dinner at the Methodist Church next week, there's this real ramp up to almost every holiday...Instead of trying to come up with a New Year's resolution to lose weight, it's a whole lot better to maybe have an Oct. 1 resolution to gain less in the first place," he said.

Stepping on scales more frequently during the holiday season, too. Participants who weighed themselves four or more times a week gained less weight and dropped it all more quickly, be the end of January. [From an articles in the New York Times Magazine by Niraj Chokshi].
